WORTH A CLOSER LOOK.

92 was the number that stayed on my mind the whole time, never left my thoughts. Not because something dramatic would happen on day ninety-two, but because that was the measure of it all (the size of this temporary life). Ninety-two days to live in another city, to build small routines from scratch, to get lost, to find new corners, and to slowly turn the unfamiliar into something that almost feels like home. Barcelona, felt a bit like a playground.¶

Not in the childish sense, but in the freedom it gives you to explore without knowing exactly where you're going. Streets become ways to wander through, buildings become textures to notice, and ordinary days turn into small experiments of living somewhere else. Along the way, I began collecting small fragments of the city. Each one holds a moment, and together they slowly form a quiet visual diary of Barcelona. Maybe that's what these ninety-two days really are: a collection of fragments, discoveries, and detours. A temporary playground where the only rule is to keep looking.¶

All the content collected in Barcelona was created using a portable scanner. Wherever I went, the scanner digitized what I saw... a fragment of a street, a corner of a building, sketches, books, small objects, everything that would later remind me of Barcelona. ¶

Each step through the city left behind traces, textures, and shapes that became part of this trip. Over time, all these fragments together, small pieces of Barcelona, created a visual diary of the experience.

P.S.: To be honest, I didn't always have the scanner with me. Even when I did, it was sometimes forgotten while simply admiring what was around. Later, I returned to those places to make the scans and associate them with each day spent here.

Imagine that this is one of those well-designed divider pages like the ones in the book CAPS LOCK. The kind that organize the book, create rhythm, and prepare the reader for what comes next. I would also like to know how to make one like that. Enjoy this visual diary.
